Saint-Mexme Collegiate Church in Chinon (A)

Gregory of Tours, in his "De la gloire des confesseurs" (On the glory of the confessors), recounts the installation in the 5th century of Mexme, a disciple of Saint Martin, in a troglodytic hermitage in Chinon, to the east of the Roman castrum which was to become the present castle. Saint Mexme is said to have founded a first church, which served as the centre of a small monastery, transformed into a collegiate church around the year 1000. The church was then rebuilt on a basilical plan, then enlarged in 1050 by the addition of a western massif comprising a narthex framed by two towers. In the 12th century, the nave was extended towards the west, a transept and a choir with an ambulatory and radiating chapels completed the transformation of the collegiate church into a vast pilgrimage building. After the Revolution, work was necessary to return the building to worship, but in 1817, the collapse of the bell tower at the transept crossing led to the ruin of the eastern parts. The remaining parts, the nave and the western section, were then transformed into a school until 1980. A vast restoration work was then undertaken, accompanied by excavations to learn more about the history of the building. The collegiate church is today an open cultural centre for temporary exhibitions. The Collegiate Church contains mural paintings from the 12th to the 15th centuries.

Saint-Étienne Church of Chinon (B)

This church was rebuilt between 1460 and 1490 by the architect Pierre Mesnager for Philippe de Commines. It occupies the place of a Romanesque building of which the base of the bell tower is a vestige (11th century). The facade is pierced by a double basket-handle door, surmounted by two hooks and fleurons braces, inscribed on either side of a canopy niche, in a tympanum circumscribed by a large brace falling on two buttresses hollowed out of niches and decorated with pinnacles. In the nave, third-point arcades separate the nave from the chapels. The choir ends with a five-sided apse pierced with flamboyant latticework windows. The stained glass windows are by L.-L. Lobin.

Rue Voltaire in Chinon (C)

This medieval street tells part of the history of the city. The site of the old Verdun Gate of the city walls became famous because it was crossed by Joan of Arc during her visit to Charles VII. The Red House with its half-timbering is worth admiring, next to the museum "Le Carroi" offers temporary exhibitions. A little further on, the church of Saint-Maurice, unfortunately closed. The only parish church in the Ville-Fort, the present Saint-Maurice church was rebuilt from the 12th century and then gradually enlarged until the 16th century. The central nave and the choir are covered with richly decorated "Angevin" type vaults with rounded ribbed vaults, while the later aisle is covered with vaults whose complex ribbing falls on Renaissance capitals.

The royal fortress of Chinon (D)

From the Place de la Brèche, in the city centre, you can reach the entrance of the Fortress with a lift.

The site of the Fortress has been occupied for three thousand years, as recent archaeological excavations have revealed. In Gallo-Roman times, Chinon was a small town. On the hillside, constructions made of stone or more modest, mud bricks, develop. Then, in the context of the end of the Roman Empire, the promontory is fortified and becomes a castrum evoked by the historian Grégoire de Tours. The promontory fortified in the 5th century continues to be occupied in the Merovingian and Carolingian periods. Vast buried silos and utilitarian buildings from this period have been found. Chinon is home to a royal monetary workshop in the 7th and 8th centuries.

In the 10th century, the Fortress was held by the Counts of Blois, great vassals of the King of France.

In the 11th century, the Counts of Anjou strongly threatened the power of the Counts of Blois. They seized Touraine in 1044. The Fortress of Chinon is at the centre of the continental possessions of the King of England Henry II Plantagenet, who in 1154 became master of an empire extending from Scotland to the Pyrenees.

Joan of Arc came to meet Charles VII at the Fortress of Chinon. From the 16th century onwards, the Fortress of Chinon had no strategic role, it was abandoned in favour of more modern castles. In 1824, in spite of the dangerousness of the site, the park of the Fortress was converted into a public promenade.

Notre-Dame de Fontevraud Abbey (G)

Notre-Dame de Fontevraud Abbey was founded by Robert d'Arbrissel, a gyrovaga preacher from Brittany. In 1099, he settled in the forest of Bort, a large community was created with substantial financial and material means. The abbey developed and a village was established at the gates of the community in the 12th century.

The transformation of the abbey into the dynastic necropolis of the Plantagenets greatly contributed to its development. Henri II, Count of Anjou and Maine, Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, King of England, married to Eleanor in 1152, made his first visit there on 21 May 1154. The couple entrusted the abbey with their two youngest children. In 1189 Henri II died in Chinon, his remains were deposited in the abbey church of Fontevraud. Richard the Lionheart will be buried next to his father in this same royal abbey church.

In the centuries that followed the abbey became prosperous and trade and industry developed. In the 17th century there were five mills, the surrounding fertile land favoured the cultivation of cereals. A market hall was built to promote trade. In the 18th century the abbey welcomed the four youngest daughters of King Louis XV. The Revolution led to the closure of the abbey and the ruin of the buildings. In 1804 the buildings were converted into a prison with more than 1000 prisoners. The presence of the prison staff favoured economic activity in the town of Fontevraud.

The closure of the Central House of Fontevraud in 1963 was followed by the destruction of most of the buildings erected during the 150 years of occupation of the site by the prison administration. The complex became the property of the Ministry of Cultural Affairs. The objective was then to recover the profile of the former Royal Abbey. Today the abbey complex has become a cultural centre.

Saint-Michel parish church at Fontevraud-l'Abbaye (H)

Since its foundation, the religious community of Fontevraud has employed workers and craftsmen for the construction of the abbey. These men and women organised themselves around a village which would take the name of Fontevraud. In 1170, Abbess Audeburge asked King Henry II for financial aid to build a parish church near the monastic enclosure. Successive parish priests were appointed by the abbesses. The parish church will be under the name of Saint-Michel.

This Romanesque church was remodelled in the 15th century and a caquetry was built in the 18th century to shelter the poor and destitute.

In the choir of the church you can admire a carved wooden altar covered with gold leaf from the abbey church of Notre-Dame. It was commissioned in the 17th century by the abbess for the abbey church of Notre-Dame. The front of the altar represents the Last Supper and the tabernacle is surmounted by a triangular pediment where two angels reveal Christ and the disciples of Emmaus.
